Michael Gormley

The project I'm most proud to have worked on is the project I'm just closing out this week. It's a feasibility study for an e methanol project. It's the first project I've worked as a study manager and hopefully have more of those opportunities in the future.

The most valuable lesson I've learned is to always say yes, however, boring and mundane some of the tasks might be. There's always something that comes out of it.

I want to paraphrase something from John Pearson. He said, the legislation and policy change is all important, but until we start putting things in the ground, building the infrastructure won't really make a difference. And I honestly believe that at Petrofac you can be part of that change and starting to build a greener and more sustainable future.

People definitely make Petrofac. It's one of the major reasons that I'm getting excited about coming into the office and everyone's approachable and they'll help you out with getting to where you need to be.
